Figure 1 is a line graph titled 'Percentage of respondents who believe that the use of force is justified in various circumstances'. The x-axis lists five circumstances: 'Self-defense', 'To protect others', 'To stop a crime', 'To punish someone', and 'To show authority'. The y-axis represents the percentage of respondents, ranging from 0 to 100. Five lines represent different groups: 'All respondents' (solid line with circles), 'Police officers' (dashed line with squares), 'Military personnel' (dotted line with triangles), 'Law enforcement' (dash-dot line with diamonds), and 'Non-law enforcement' (long-dash line with crosses). The graph shows that all groups generally believe that the use of force is justified in self-defense and to protect others, with percentages ranging from approximately 85% to 95%. For stopping a crime, the percentages are lower, ranging from approximately 65% to 80%. For punishing someone and showing authority, the percentages are the lowest, ranging from approximately 40% to 60%.
